Thomas Jefferson had answered him eloquently two centuries before. "No government ought to be without censors," he wrote. "And where the press is free, none ever will. The only security of all is in a free press. The agitation it produces must be submitted to. It is necessary to keep the waters pure."